The Conrier likewise explains the old notion that, when a pins wood is cut away, an oak forest succeeds it, and so rice ered. The former is usually true, because in every pinn wood may be found a great mony oaks dwarfed by its shade and kept dottuent or stationary. But the very moment the over-topping pines are remov-ed, the sun and light bring forward the oaks to take their place, and the pines disappear. Love Ann Decertion — Flight of a Leather Merchant on the Ere of his Wedding. — A washiby leather merchant of Whitamedurg, who does liminess in the swamp, and has a branch establishment in Manchester, England, was engaged to be married to a leantiful young lady of Williamshurg, but on the even of the wedding endedly disappeared. The merchant is a man about forty years of age, a will-ower, and the father of five children. The lady la an orphan. She belongs to one of the tirst families in Williamshurg, and was in every way a meet eligible match. In addition to her personal attractions, she is raid to be a most accomplished lady, and the beiress to a considerable fortune. She is it is junior of the gentlemen to whom she was to be urited by come fifteen years.

For some time past he has been most devoted in his attentions to her, and the wedding day had been fixed. In an unguarded moment her love overcame her discretion. Asia ton often the case under such creumstances, his affection absted, and upon various prolexis he put off the day fixed for their marriage. At length, to bring matters to a crisis, the lady's two brothers, one of whom Is a wealthy contractor of Brocklyn, and the other a large farmer in Pennsylvania, had an interview with the geuleman the early persof the week, and told him if hadid not fulfil his promise they would take aummary vengence upon him. A second interview was had last Inesday, at which Inh lady was present. The merchant then fixed upon Friday evening last for the celepration of the nuprials.

The wedding dress was prepared, the guasts were invited, and every preparation made for the cremony. Friday evening came, the guests were present, the bride and her maids arrayed, and the clergyman in waiting; but the bridegreom came mot Yesterday the brother, accompanied by their eiter, waited upon the May or of this city, and a warrant for the merchant of the world companied by their reiter, waited upon the May or of this city, and a warrant for the merchant's arreet was issued
